Butler, Snow, O'Mara, Stevens & Cannada, PLLC – which recently expanded its Nashville office by nearly 40 attorneys – today donated $100,000 to the Frist Center for the Visual Arts, reinforcing the firm's community involvement as it grows its presence in the city.

"We are committed to strengthening Nashville's thriving and innovative business culture through our team of attorneys in Middle Tennessee," said Donald Clark, Jr., chairman of Butler Snow. "Fostering a rich culture of arts and community involvement is a hallmark of our firm. We are proud of what The Frist Center for the Visual Arts has become for Nashville, the state and the nation."

Tenn. Gov. Bill Haslam, Nashville Mayor Karl Dean, former Miss. Gov. Haley Barbour, former U.S. Rep. John Tanner and other officials attended an event called "Embracing the Arts. Impacting the Community" at the Frist Center, which celebrated Butler Snow's Nashville expansion and growing roots in the city. Clark and Dan H. Elrod, a leading member of Butler Snow's Nashville team, presented the check to Susan H. Edwards, executive director and chief executive officer of the Frist Center. Business leaders, community representatives and dignitaries also attended the event.

"Having a healthy arts culture helps build robust communities throughout Tennessee, and this generous commitment from Butler Snow will help keep Nashville and our state on the leading edge of the arts nationwide," Haslam said.

"This was a significant reason that we were drawn to Butler Snow," Elrod said. "Butler Snow has a great heritage of embracing the arts and enriching the communities where we serve, and we are glad to be leading this charge in Nashville."

The $100,000 donation will be used to broaden the Frist Center's outreach globally.
